The Story of One Battalion . . . the Thirty-Third

Perhaps the best starting point for the story of the 33rd (Special) U. S. Naval Construction Battalion is the Stevedore Pool at Camp Peary, Virginia. While waiting for assignment to a Special Battalion the men in the pool cut wood, drilled, or went on guard duty and other details. The deary winter months of 1943-44 slowly passed, but green wood fought a losing battle against the chill of the Virginia nights. Colds and cat fever laid many low. In April the pool prepared to move to Rhode Island. Men were shifted from one barrack to another, got their hair cut short, and stood inspections. On April 15 and 16 the trains pulled out to the strains of "Carry Me Back to Old Virginnny."

Camp Endicott, neat and compact, was to most men an improvement over Peary. Barracks were more comfortable. Recreation-Ship's Service buildings offered various opportunities for spending leisure time. It was but a short ride to Providence with its friendly people, its canteens, night clubs, and theaters. The New England countryside was attractive, but poison ivy brought long lines to sick bay. Boston and New York drew men for week-end liberty. But, of course, there was work as well as play. A provisional 33rd Battalion was formed and men were assigned to technical training courses. Then came a move to Sun Valley for six weeks of military training—rifle range, extended order, and bivouac. Life seemed rather free and easy, chow was good, and "Don't Fence Me In" was not yet a popular song.

Coming of Age.

Returning to Endicott for a busy month the men were given stevedore training. Meanwhile, the battalion had received its Officer-in-Charge and its Executive Officer and was soon to be commissioned. In a colorful ceremony on July 15, with officers and men in dress white uniforms, the battalion received its colors and marched in review before high Naval officers and civil officials. As the month drew to a close, time tables were studied and railroad tickets bought for the eagerly awaited embarkation leave which began July 30.

At Sea....

A few days after the return to camp, the battalion moved to Camp Thomas. Rumor and speculation ran high. Would it stay there for any length of time or would it soon move? The answer was not long in coming. After making a notable contribution to the cleanliness of the camp, the men packed their gear and boarded troop sleepers for California.

Through car windows on the transcontinental trip could be seen something of the rich farming country of the Middle West, cities large and small, and the mountains and ranches of the West. Men played cards, read, and looked at the scenery. It made a pleasant change to have an occasional stop when they could get off the train and have refreshments served by a friendly group of people or have a meal in a restaurant. So the days and miles passed until Camp Parks was reached. The accumulated grime of the trip was removed and clothes were scrubbed and hung out to dry quickly in the intense heat. There was time for a liberty in San Francisco and a bit of clean-up about the area before moving on to Port Hueneme.

Here the Battalion lived on Easy Street, near the gate, the store and the library, enjoying, after a few days of mist and fog, the delightful California climate. Carbines, gas masks, and packs were issued; there was a course of military training; the stevedores were hard at work; battalion gear was assembled and packed; men were transferred in and out. Liberty meant going to fabulous Hollywood, to Los Angeles, Ocean Park or Santa Monica, with all their varied attractions and servicemen's facilities. Preparations went on busily and at length the day of departure came. On October 26, in groups of fifteen, with packs, carbines, gas masks, and seabags, men climbed into trucks for the ride to the docks. They filed up the gang plank and down into the hold for assignment to bunks. In a few hours the ship sailed and soon the shores of the United States faded from sight.

The ship was the M/S Torrens, a Norwegian cargo vessel with a captain and crew of that nationality, and now chartered as an Army transport. Rules were necessarily strict but often irksome. Water canteens and life preservers were carried at all times. Boat drills were essential routine as was the blackout. There was some kind of duty for all—clean up, security watch, gun crew, and the like. There were long lines for the two meals served daily in the mess hall. At noon came sandwiches with the inevitable spam. Sleeping quarters were crowded, the heat was unpleasant, and washing in salt water discouraging. Men played cards interminably on deck; they sat about reading or dozing; they leaned on the rail and gazed at the ocean expanses; they watched boxing matches and attended shows and movies.
