USS ENTERPRISE (CVAN-65)
NARRATIVE COMMAND HISTORY 1968

After spending Christmas in her homeport of Alameda, California, ENTERPRISE sailed for her third Western Pacific cruise January 3, 1968.

In company with her two escorts, the nuclear-powered frigate USS TRUXTON (DLGN-35) and the conventionally-powered frigate USS HALSEY (DLG-23), ENTERPRISE steamed into Sasebo, Japan, January 19. ENTERPRISE and TRUXTON were the first elements of the U.S. Navy's nuclear-powered surface fleet to visit a Japanese port.

During the five-day inport period at Sasebo, the city suffered wide-spread controversy and violent demonstrations among its citizenry. Despite the underlying theme of "anti-Americanism" during the anti-nuclear riots, all three ships spent the entire inport period in Sasebo without one incident, desertion or absentee involving crewmembers.

ENTERPRISE departed Sasebo on the morning of January 23, enroute to Yankee Station in Tonkin Gulf. Shortly after sailing, she was suddenly ordered into the Sea of Japan, following the seizure of the Naval intelligence vessel USS PUEBLO (AGER-2) by a North Korean patrol boat. ENTERPRISE became the flagship for the specially-created Task Force 71, under the command of Rear Admiral Horace H. EPES Jr., remaining within the vicinity of South Korea for almost a month as part of the U.S. build-up of forces in the area in the aftermath of the crisis.

Following her relief in the Sea of Japan February 16, ENTERPRISE was once again ordered to Yankee Station. After two days of upkeep at Naval Station Subic Bay, Republic of the Philippines, she arrived on Yankee Station February 21, beginning combat operations the following day.

ENCLOSURE (1)
Upon her arrival at Yankee Station, ENTERPRISE encountered poor flying weather brought about by the Asian monsoon season. Nevertheless, two days after arrival, ENTERPRISE A6A Intruders from Attack Squadron 35 were able to carry out the first surprise raid on the port facility of North Vietnam's capital city of Hanoi. During the pre-dawn attack, the all-weather radar controlled bombers dodged a flurry of surface-to-air missiles and a heavy barrage of anti-aircraft fire, inflicting severe damages against the vitally important enemy supply center.

Two more strikes were made against the port facility during the following weeks. In each case, pilots of the highly sophisticated A6's reported good systems runs. The computerized flying systems were proving invaluable in only their second tour aboard ENTERPRISE. Loaded with far more ordnance than contemporary aircraft and depending on a computerized radar system to guide them to their targets, pilots of the Grumman-built Intruder actually welcomed the cover of darkness and inclement weather.

Throughout February and much of March, North Vietnam was shrouded in a blanket of heavy clouds and torrential rains brought about by the northeast monsoon. However, much like the proverbial mailman, the Intruders of Attack Squadron 35 penetrated the unkind monsoon night after night, striking repeatedly against the heartland of North Vietnam.

In the south along the Demilitarized Zone, A4 Skyhawks of Attack Squadrons 56 and 113 and F4 Phantoms of Fighter Squadrons 92 and 96 joined Air Force and other Navy fighter-bombers, disrupting enemy supply routes and destroying bunkers, storage areas and artillery positions.

At the same time, more Air Wing NINE airplanes joined with other Air Force and Navy planes in defense of the besieged Marine encampment at Khe Sanh. By the first week of March, Communist guerrilla forces were at the fortress perimeter, digging assault trenches and bunkers. Armed with 1,000-pound bombs with delayed-action fuzes, ENTERPRISE planes were soon caving them in as fast as they were dug. ENTERPRISE pilots doggedly pursued their combat support missions around the strategically located encampment until the sustained air attack and improved weather conditions managed to break the siege. The cowered remnants of North Vietnamese units, beaten and forced to follow new strategy, withdrew into the jungle.

On March 13, a chance break in the weather permitted a large ENTERPRISE strike group to hit the Haiphong Rail and Highway Bridge West. In the air wing's only major multi-plane "alpha" strike into North Vietnam's heartland before curtailment of bombing above the 20th parallel, ENTERPRISE fighter-bombers dove through the parted monsoon clouds to complete their highly successful mission. Post-strike photography confirmed the bridge was down.

ENTERPRISE was on the line when President Johnson announced March 31 that bombing had been restricted to targets below the 20th parallel.

With the advent of the new bombing limitations and the breaking up of the monsoon weather, ENTERPRISE pilots concentrated their efforts against trucks, barges, bridges and storage areas near the city of Vinh. Strikes were heavy against the Vinh Transshipment point, the southernmost collection point for war materails before they are dispersed along the Ho Chi Minh Trail west into Laos and south into South Vietnam.

Typical targets in the area of Vinh were large truck convoys moving under cover of darkness. On the night of April 15, air wing pilots spotted an unusually large convoy movement. One pilot described it as "more trucks than I could count. Headlights stretched as fas as you could see and dispersed into the haze."
As Navy pilots began to systematically destroy bridges and roads and strike petroleum storage areas, the number of convoys and trucks sighted began to decrease sharply.

On May 8, Navy planes from carriers on Yankee Station in Tonkin Gulf, including a large complement from ENTERPRISE, struck what was described as the largest Communist petroleum and ammunition storage area south of the 20th parallel. In three days of ceaseless bombing, the Xom Trung Hoa Storage Area northwest of Vinh yielded to hundreds of secondary explosions as Navy pilots dropped bomb after bomb on the strategic supply center.

In May as diplomatic efforts were slowly leading toward peace talks in Paris, ENTERPRISE, continuing her air attacks on panhandle targets, remained in total combat readiness to thwart a possible "last push" the Communists were expected to make to improve their bargaining position in Paris.

On May 20, ENTERPRISE departed Yankee Station, and after a brief stop in Subic Bay, entered Hong Kong for a week of rest and liberty for the crew. The week-long portcall was a pleasant, relatively quiet experience for ENTERPRISE, despite a Communist Chinese protest that Seventh Fleet warships were allegedly using the British Crown Colony as a base of operations in the Vietnam war. The charge was quickly spurned by British authorities, and the ship sailed as scheduled May 30 for her final line period of the deployment.

On June 9, shortly after her arrival on Yankee Station, General William C. Westmoreland, Commander Military Assistance Command Vietnam, arrived on board ENTERPRISE. The general was enroute to Washington to assume the position of Chief of Staff of the Army. He had chosen ENTERPRISE as the setting for his farewell address to the Seventh Fleet.
Interdiction strikes over the panhandle of North Vietnam continued until June 26, when ENTERPRISE and her veteran air wing finished a third successful combat cruise and began the voyage home.

ENTERPRISE arrived at her homeport of Alameda July 18. After a brief stay, during which post-deployment conferences were conducted, she departed July 27 on "Operation Northwest Passage" enroute to the Puget Sound Naval Shipyard, Bremerton, Washington. During "Operation Northwest Passage," dependents were invited to board ENTERPRISE for the trip to the yard. The operation was an overwhelming success with the number of dependents arriving aboard far exceeding the original estimate.

ENTERPRISE arrived in the yard July 29, where she remained until September 28, undergoing a much-needed overhaul. Upon departure from Bremerton, dependents were once again welcomed aboard, this time for the return to Alameda.

Back in Alameda, the newly rejuvenated carrier prepared for refresher training exercises off the coast of California. Departing Alameda October 9, she alternated inport periods with refresher training and combat readiness exercises along the West Coast until November 22, when she returned to Alameda for her annual Administrative and Material Inspection.

On December 3, ENTERPRISE joined 27 other ships and 31 air squadrons of the First Fleet for "Operation Beeftrust," a seven-day combat training exercise conducted off the coast of Southern California. The sixth and final exercise exercise conducted by First Fleet for the year was designed to prepare the participating units for combat they would encounter not only in Vietnam, but anywhere in the Western Pacific.

Following "Operation Beeftrust," ENTERPRISE returned to port in Alameda and prepared for the Christmas holidays, prior to an expected fourth deployment to Southeast Asia in early January.
